While Adobe continues to conveniently stick the Lightroom label and brand logo on all of its image-editing software, it might be worth taking some time now and again to look at the real feature sets of the individual programs. In this article, we'll be looking at Lightroom versus Photoshop Elements. Adobe is evincing an assisted learning focus with Lightroom 5. This could be to help recent users buy into the change. Personally, I have not used any previous Lightroom versions, so I cannot recommend from that experience. In order to understand what is meant by the tag-line "Easier to make", I attempted to follow the demo using a number of images as inspiration. Though I did not need to export any images to filmstrip display, this process was still miles more involved than those of Lightroom 4. Also, the UI did not show a progress meter. The "add to library" object could not be selected for importing and many cropping options were not available. In addition, there was no option to compare photo samples for a change of look. For instance, the image shown was an original image selected for "skin". However, after presentation it was changed to a "background" and the "mask" option in a photo I had selected was not even listed. There are many other examples where this program did not behave as I expected or expected. I would conclude that it is "Easier to make" for a new user, but not for a seasoned user or an "expert". For these reasons, I have a much smaller recommendation of this update.

We started the company by helping people create images for desktop publishing (DTP). That's when I realized not everyone was using DTP in the same way. While all of the other designs were gaining traction, the big publishers wanted our help in making their images look like everybody else. It gave the designers something to aspire to and gave them something to aim for, separate from the resolve of the editorial department and the business goals. That's when the whole 90's New York boom of design took off. Satisfying that need is at the core of Photoshop and Photoshop Camera. What a crazy achievement to be a part of. I think that it is important to note that Adobe is often pegged for getting left behind by competitive products. Making a studio room I am personally in is the necessity of competing in the rarified world of editing. Photoshop from the very beginning was built to be the greatest editing tool in the world. It continues to be the best option when you're editing anything large. Using their tools to create smaller pieces of art is easier though. Intentionalizing the design process for professional clients is what has allowed us to really set the stage for the future: the future of Photoshop actually used to edit on a device for normal people. Adobe is a company that is known for envisioning the future, and for being two steps ahead. The future that Photoshop is making today for creatives is where we want to be the first to go. It's what we want to be known for. By going where the biggest need of the world is, that is exactly what we are creating. 933d7f57e6
