These past few months, I've been reading some content that really changed the way I look at typesetting. One, I'd like to share what I've been reading with you, even though you may not yet be a typesetter. The New Typesetting as a Service by Charles Bryan. This value-driven course by Charles Bryan on Twitter demonstrates what it means to be a true typesetter and a true creative. In The New Typesetting as a Service , Bryan provides a convenient reminder of how to understand what a typesetter can accomplish, as well as insightful tips for identifying and overcoming challenges in preparing content for publication. This is the perfect introduction to the All Things Digital blog series. I've had the pleasure of meeting Charles Bryan a number of times. He's an inspiring educator with a knack for covering all things digital (and often including his personal life). His courses are definitely worth checking out. Doing so requires the Surface Pro that monitors it. Not that we are going to get too deeply into the technical aspects of the app. Suffice it to say, you create both negative (white) and positive (black) layers. Then, you can draw on either layer and paint with the iPad Pro. The iPad Pro is great at detecting what you are drawing, picking up the pencil and displaying it in the image preview. There is no lag. All of this seems like it might be a slow process, but it is astonishingly fast. Painting is easy. I didn't realize that all I had to do was drag the mouse to draw, as I thought I was supposed to select the tool first. Once I made a mistake, I was able to undo and redo with a single click. The selection tools are near-perfect. I have been able to paint around various selections much more easily than before, and that makes creating selections for other Photoshop tools much simpler, too.

Adobe has added layers to the tools in Elements, making it easier to select and merge objects. A new feature in Elements, called Multiply, allows you to manipulate the brightness of an image. You can apply this effect to any layer, and it's perfect for adding radiance to portraits or glassware. Multiply can be used with masks to darken specific parts of the image – useful for areas of a photo that you want to appear slightly dimmer than the rest. Adobe has announced that it is creating a shared workspace for all of its creative applications, working with its product development units and software product teams to connect them into one location. A new study from Adobe Insights has highlighted that Instagram is the leading social network for Photoshop and Lightroom. The online seminars grew 27% year-on-year, with Photoshop the most popular product on the platform. Users love to share the creations they make using Photoshop and Lightroom, with over 80% of the new videos in the first five weeks of the year, 2019, being from the two tools. Adobe is also using its big data division, Adobe Sensei, to create useful updates for Surface Pro users which are light and fast, without the performance hit users usually get from other products. It's especially useful for creative professionals who need to edit large-size images and videos while using a computer in the field. Adobe is also working with SNRe, a manufacturer of mobile displays, and has developed a new, one-inch display using SNRe's 1.2-inch quantum dot technology. It measures just 5.9mm thick, which makes it 50% thinner than a standard 13-inch laptop. The resulting tablet boasts a resolution of 64 GB, pixel-perfect colour quality, and a range of more than 10 million colours (in comparison, a conventional 13-inch laptop has a resolution of 3 GB). A new speed of up to 240 Hz aims to be up to three times faster than standard ultrabook displays, with low power consumption.
