If you are paranoid, perhaps you should consider hosting your website on a cheap external hard drive or a private Amazon AWS instance. It's also possible to change your website so that it will only render after an Internet connection is renewed. But it's a hassle. Much easier to just disable navigation caching in your browser, of course. In spite of its problems with security and performance, Photoshop Elements remains very popular and it is a superb alternative to Photoshop. I do not use it per se, but I use its Capture One library.
